Principles – Inhouse Peer Review

1. In-house submissions are reports, research papers, or project outcomes, which are submitted internally to the journal. In-house submissions are contributions from editors or members of their affiliated workgroups.
2. The peer review for the scientific evaluation of in-house submissions must be carried out with particular care ensure strict impartiality and transparency of decisions.
3. The selection of reviewers is strictly based on their expertise to ensure a thorough and well-founded evaluation of the submission.
4. To ensure strict impartiality, the editors and reviewers involved in the review and editorial decisions must not have been directly or indirectly involved in the creation of the work. For in-house articles, editors are excluded from the review process, and the articles must be evaluated exclusively by external reviewers.
5. Once the review is completed, reviewers provide their feedback and comments to the editor-in-chief, who then forwards these to the author. The editor-in-chief also provides an overall assessment. If the editor-in-chief is author, a knowledgeable and independent member of the editorial board serves in this function.
6. All stages of the peer review process, including feedback and the final decision, are documented in the Editorial Manager system. This serves as a record for quality assurance and ensures transparency in the decision-making process.
7. Confidentiality: Due to the internal nature of this process, special care must be taken to protect confidential information. All participants are required to maintain confidentiality.
