Principles – Inhouse Peer Review

1. The peer review process for in-house submissions involves the scientific evaluation of works such as reports, research papers, or project outcomes, which are submitted internally to the journal. In-house submissions are submission of editors or their affiliated work group members which are routinely make decisions on manuscript and selection of reviewers.
2. Any editor, member of the scientific board or of the publication committee must not be involved in any decision on a manuscript which is considered an in-house submission.
3. Editors and reviewers are assigned by a designated authority which is an editor by chance from the list of senior and junior editors. Editor and reviewers possess the necessary expertise to assess the submission and act independently in their evaluations. To ensure impartiality, editors and reviewers must not have been directly or indirectly involved in the creation of the work.
4. Once the review is completed, the reviewers provide their feedback and comments to the editor, who then forwards these to the author. The editor also gives an overall assessment.
5. All stages of the peer review process, including feedback and the final decision, are documented in the Editorial Manager. This serves as a record for quality assurance and provides transparency in the decision-making process.
6. Confidentiality: Given the internal nature of this process, particular care must be taken to protect confidential information. All participants are required to maintain confidentiality.
